

A watt of trouble

A modern, satirical management sim inspired by classic 2000s Flash games, set in a dense, quirky, and anthropomorphic vision of Hong Kong.

What

A published point-and-click satirical simulator heavily inspired by McDonald's flash game. You switch between 4 views, try to keep up and maintain the company alive as long as possible.

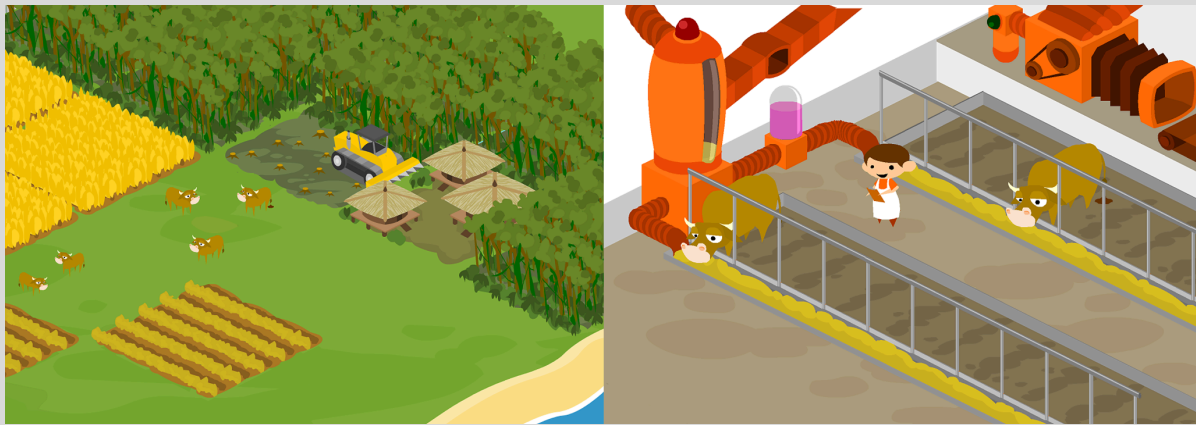

Why a published game

I have almost 5 years of professional game development experience. I have conducted interviews to hire developers and artists, and while it's impressive to have a solid portfolio, it doesn't say a lot if it's not published. A published product puts you in the warzone with massive critics, real revenue to survive on and proves you know all the caveats.

Why this game in specific

Looking at the current trends, there's this escapism towards nostalgic themes. For example, we have seen 90's style clothing making a comeback. I want to take an old flash game (the McDonalds Flash Game) and re-make it with a twist: Our own storyline, modern graphics and controls.

Our twist:

Where does the twist come from

I am a big fan of strange, quirky themes. I find humans boring:

Ever had some cool shirt you love suddenly disappear?

That's because there's little creatures lurking through the furniture and stealing things!

Another example is Over the Garden Wall. Two kids are lost in the woods and have wild adventures with singing frogs and talking animals. The reality is, that they are dying and they are passing "to the other side".

In our case, Hong Kong neon signs come from little creatures called neon fireflies, who are harvested for their light by anthropomorphic pandas.

Notes

The artstyle and depth of the game mechanics depends entirely on the team's strength, which we don't know yet. This will be solidified on the brainstorm stage; stages are explained on the assignment submission. This can be clarified on the pitch.
